Name of Individual to be Researched:

Enter the full name of the individual you are researching. If the individual had multiple names or aliases, provide all known variations.

Dates of Interest:

Specify the time period relevant to your research. Include the range of dates for birth, marriage, death, or any other significant events. If the exact dates are unknown, provide the closest estimates or qualifiers (e.g., "circa," "before," "after").

Locations of Interest:

Clearly identify the specific locations associated with the individual's life events. Include the city or town, county, and state. If applicable, note any international locations.

Relationship to Other Individuals:

If the research involves familial connections, specify the relationships of the individual to other family members, such as parents, spouses, or children.

Objective of Research:

Clearly state the research goal or question you are seeking to answer. Be specific about the information you hope to discover or confirm.

Known Information:

Provide any known details about the individual that can guide the research process. This may include occupation, military service, religious affiliation, or any other relevant information.

Sources Already Checked:

List any sources or repositories you have already consulted in your research. This helps avoid duplication of effort and provides context for further investigation.

Additional Notes or Comments:

Use this section to include any additional information or research notes relevant to the ancestor. Include sources or references whenever possible.
